The city of Gloucester, with its population these days of some 100,000, is said to be famous for its Cathedral, elvers and rugger, though not necessarily in that order. Elvers, peculiar to the River Severn, are essentially a piscatorial delicacy in the spring time for those natives of Gloucester and the surrounding area, which is why the club and its fervent supporters are sometimes known as the "Elver-eaters".

Rugby football in Gloucester is virtually a religion and has been since the club was founded in 1873; and its famous ground, Kingsholm, is regarded with almost the same reverence as the Cathedral. Gloucester is probably the only city in England where the handling code takes complete priority among its sporting population during the long winter months.

Gloucester, whose many achievements in their long history include that of being the first ever winners of the Rugby Union national club knockout, in 1972, a feat they repeated two years ago, can also claim to have the most dedicated and fervent supporters in the country.

Perhaps those devoted followers felt that their champions had let them down last season when they not only failed in the John Player Cup but scored less points — 798 — than in any season since 1970-71. Yet how many clubs would feel depressed over a record of 35 wins and two drawn matches, with only 11 lost?

Moreover, the Cherry and Whites again topped the South-West merit table and recorded several memorable victories, including "doubles" over Coventry and Newport, despite the fact that county matches as usual deprived them of key players in the earlier part of the season and a mounting injury list added to their problems in the closing months.
